In this article, the author highlights the importance of well-written and researched funding proposals. She has seen too many badly constructed proposals - peppered with irrelevant information and project budgets that could leave potential donors doubting the ability of organisations to use scarce financial resources.

Listening to Sapiens and there's talk somewhere in the first half of the book 3rd or 4th chapter about "The Luxury Trap". Paraphrasing here, but the author mentions that: When introduced into a person's life, a new comfort is at first a luxury, then a treat, then no big deal, and then an expectation.

Is this it? Get a job, have kids and then die and fade ...

@Jonathan — Interesting thoughts. I don't think it's all about memories though, which is where my power analogy comes from. Your mother may have more money than she forseeably needs now, but she also presumably knew for many years that she would have enough.
